

*"She Was Everything, All at Once"
In loving memory of my mother*

*She cracked a joke at the worst of times,
Made you laugh when you wanted to cry—
A smirk, a wink, a side-eyed glance,
Always five steps ahead, oh my.*

*She knew how to press every button I had,
Lord, she could drive me insane.
But even in moments I rolled my eyes,
She wrapped all that teasing in love, not disdain.*

*She called too much—but not enough now,
Left half-full Pepsis and loud gospel songs.
She'd fuss and she'd fret over nothing at all,
But in her heart, she meant no wrongs.*

*She was thunder and sunshine in the same breath,
Soft hands that knew how to hold pain.
She taught me to stand, to fight, to forgive—
And to dance outside in the rain.*

*She wasn't perfect, thank God for that,
She was real, and raw, and right.
She loved out loud, with fire and hugs,
And tucked me in every night.*

*Now silence stretches where her laugh once rang,
But echoes of her fill the air—
In every odd habit and joke I repeat,
I feel her, still loving, still there.*

*So I'll honor her not with only my tears,
But with laughter and fierce, stubborn grace.
Because she was everything, all at once—
And this world was better with her in its place.*
